GOSSIP OF THE GIRLS.

Alice Confides in Dear Louise the Gongs On in Washington.

DEAR LOUISE: July, so far, is behaving just as June did—giving us days of uncomfortable heat, followed by disagreeably cold spells. This capricious conduct make many who would have been off long ago to mountains or seashore hug the pleasures and comforts of their own city houses, well knowing that nothing is more dreary and depressing than a summer resort in wintry-like weather.

We have, however, almost nothing of the Administration left in the city. The extensive repairs and decorations now in progress in the White House will prevent its occupancy by the President for many weeks. Mrs. Harrison will take this consoling thought with her into official retirement, that her good works will live after her. The first two years of her life in the White House have been devoted to cleaning it up, and in the last two she is to have the satisfaction of directing its improvement and decoration. This is a crumb of comfort in the face of the disappointment Mrs. Harrison must feel in Congress not appropriating money for building a grand extension to the historic mansion. I was present on one occasion when the late Mrs. Harrison explained to a friend a few of Mrs. Harrison's ideas about remodeling the house, and I remember among other changes she would have the conservatories adjoin the East Room. But it looks as though the conservatories and everything else would remain just where they are, unless a great change comes speedily over the spirit of Congress' dream. From all accounts the President is thoroughly enjoying domestic life at Cape May Point, where it is quite noticeable he is always accompanied in his saunterings and outings by Baby McKee and Mrs. Dimmick. The latter seems to be as faithfully and dutifully attentive as she was during her brief residence in the White House. Mrs. Parker and her husband, Lieutenant Parker, of the Navy, are also members of the Presidential household at Cape May.

We had just said good-bye to the summer to Senator and Madame Romero, who are always people of interest in Washington, when the news came that Baroness Zedwitz (nee Caldwell), wife of the German Minister to Mexico, had declared war against her fellow-countrywoman, Madame Mariscal (nee Laura Smith), wife of Senator Romero's predecessor as Minister to Washington. The why and the wherefore of this I have not been told—only that Baroness Zedwitz had declined to visit or receive visits from Madame Mariscal. This piece of gossip will awaken considerable interest here, where Madame Mariscal had quite a brilliant career as the wife of the Mexican Minister, and where, I am told, she was born and raised. Miss Smith was married to Senator Mariscal over twenty years ago in St. Matthew's Church, and the greater part of their married life has been spent in this city, where Madame Mariscal was always well received in society. Now, why Baroness Zedwitz draws the line in a foreign country against her own countrywoman is an interesting question. The upsetting of Miss Mary Caldwell's ambition to be a princess seems to have had a quieting effect on her rather excitable temperament, for she is residing peacefully at Newport, where she is contemplating the purchase of the late historian Bancroft's estate. The modest cottage now standing is to be demolished, should Miss Caldwell conclude the purchase, and on its site she will erect a villa "as is a villa."

I know of no people more progressive and wide-awake than the Coreans. Each season they select fresh fields and pastures new for a summer outing. This year they are seeing what summer life is at fashionable Greenbrier, last season they tried Orkney, and the year before Capon. I am sorry for the exhibition of progress in the matter of clothes, for it was certainly interesting to see them in their native costumes.

The Countess Divonne, nee Audenreid, though gone from our sight, is not going to be forgotten. The very latest sensation is her hairbreadth escape in Paris from death or serious injury by the running away of a new pair of horses she was experimenting with in her carriage. The animals became frightened at something and dashed forward with such speed as to land the Countess on her head. Fortunately the injury was more in bruises than any serious hurt.

The interesting rumor that General Baird and Mrs. Audenreid have agreed to spend the autumn of their lives together seems to be confirmed by their frequent companionship in long morning and afternoon drives. When the event will occur no one seems to know exactly—and they certainly have reached a time of life when they ought to be able to settle such a matter without advice. Mrs. Audenreid will spend a portion of the season at the White Sulphur.

Will Secretary Blaine ever come back here? This is a question I heard discussed a few evenings since. He is evidently a very sick man, and, as is the case of all officials, I have noticed that, up to the moment of death almost, rosy reports are sent out. And yet—how soon they are forgotten and their places filled! This makes me think of the Windows, who have just left the city for the summer. Washington is hereafter to be their permanent abode, but I understand they will not again occupy the elegant house on Massachusetts avenue.

Midsummer dullness has struck the theatres, and the summer opera for this season is a thing of the past. But the shoppers appear to be as numerous as ever, and in the big establishments one sees how many people really are in town. July is a great bargain month. In all the large dry goods houses the odds and ends left from the past year are marked down at less than half the original price. That important adjunct of a woman's toilet, the parasol, some of them perfectly lovely, is now to be had for almost a trifle. A woman with an artistic eye can pick out the exact background best calculated to show off her good looks, for the parasol of to-day is of as much use as a background as it once was as a sun protector. There are lovely ones of white, pink, lavender, crimson, or yellow, but the rose-colored parasol is the one most universally becoming, and the one I advise you to possess yourself of and use most frequently during the summer campaign. As ever, yours, ALICE.
